For years, I thought
being quiet meant
I had nothing to say.

Tech conferences looked amazing.

Confident people.
Fast-talking people.
Fluent people.

"That's not for someone like me."

The 5 Toos

of my Imposter

Too quiet.

Too late.

Too old.

Too niche.

Too non-native.

I was not new to speaking.

I was new to being visible.

My first stage was not a stage.

It was a digital
community room.

I became an MVP

before I allowed myself
to feel like a tech speaker.

Recognition does not automatically silence your imposter.

Then I discovered something “dangerous”.

I actually enjoyed it.

Two voices.

Voice One

"Your topic is not important enough."

Voice Two

"Your English is not good enough."

Both were wrong. But both were loud.

The Niche

Business builds processes.

Games build motivation.

What if both
could exist at once?

That was the niche.
It felt too small to matter.
It wasn't.

English was not just a language
problem.

Fear of mistakes

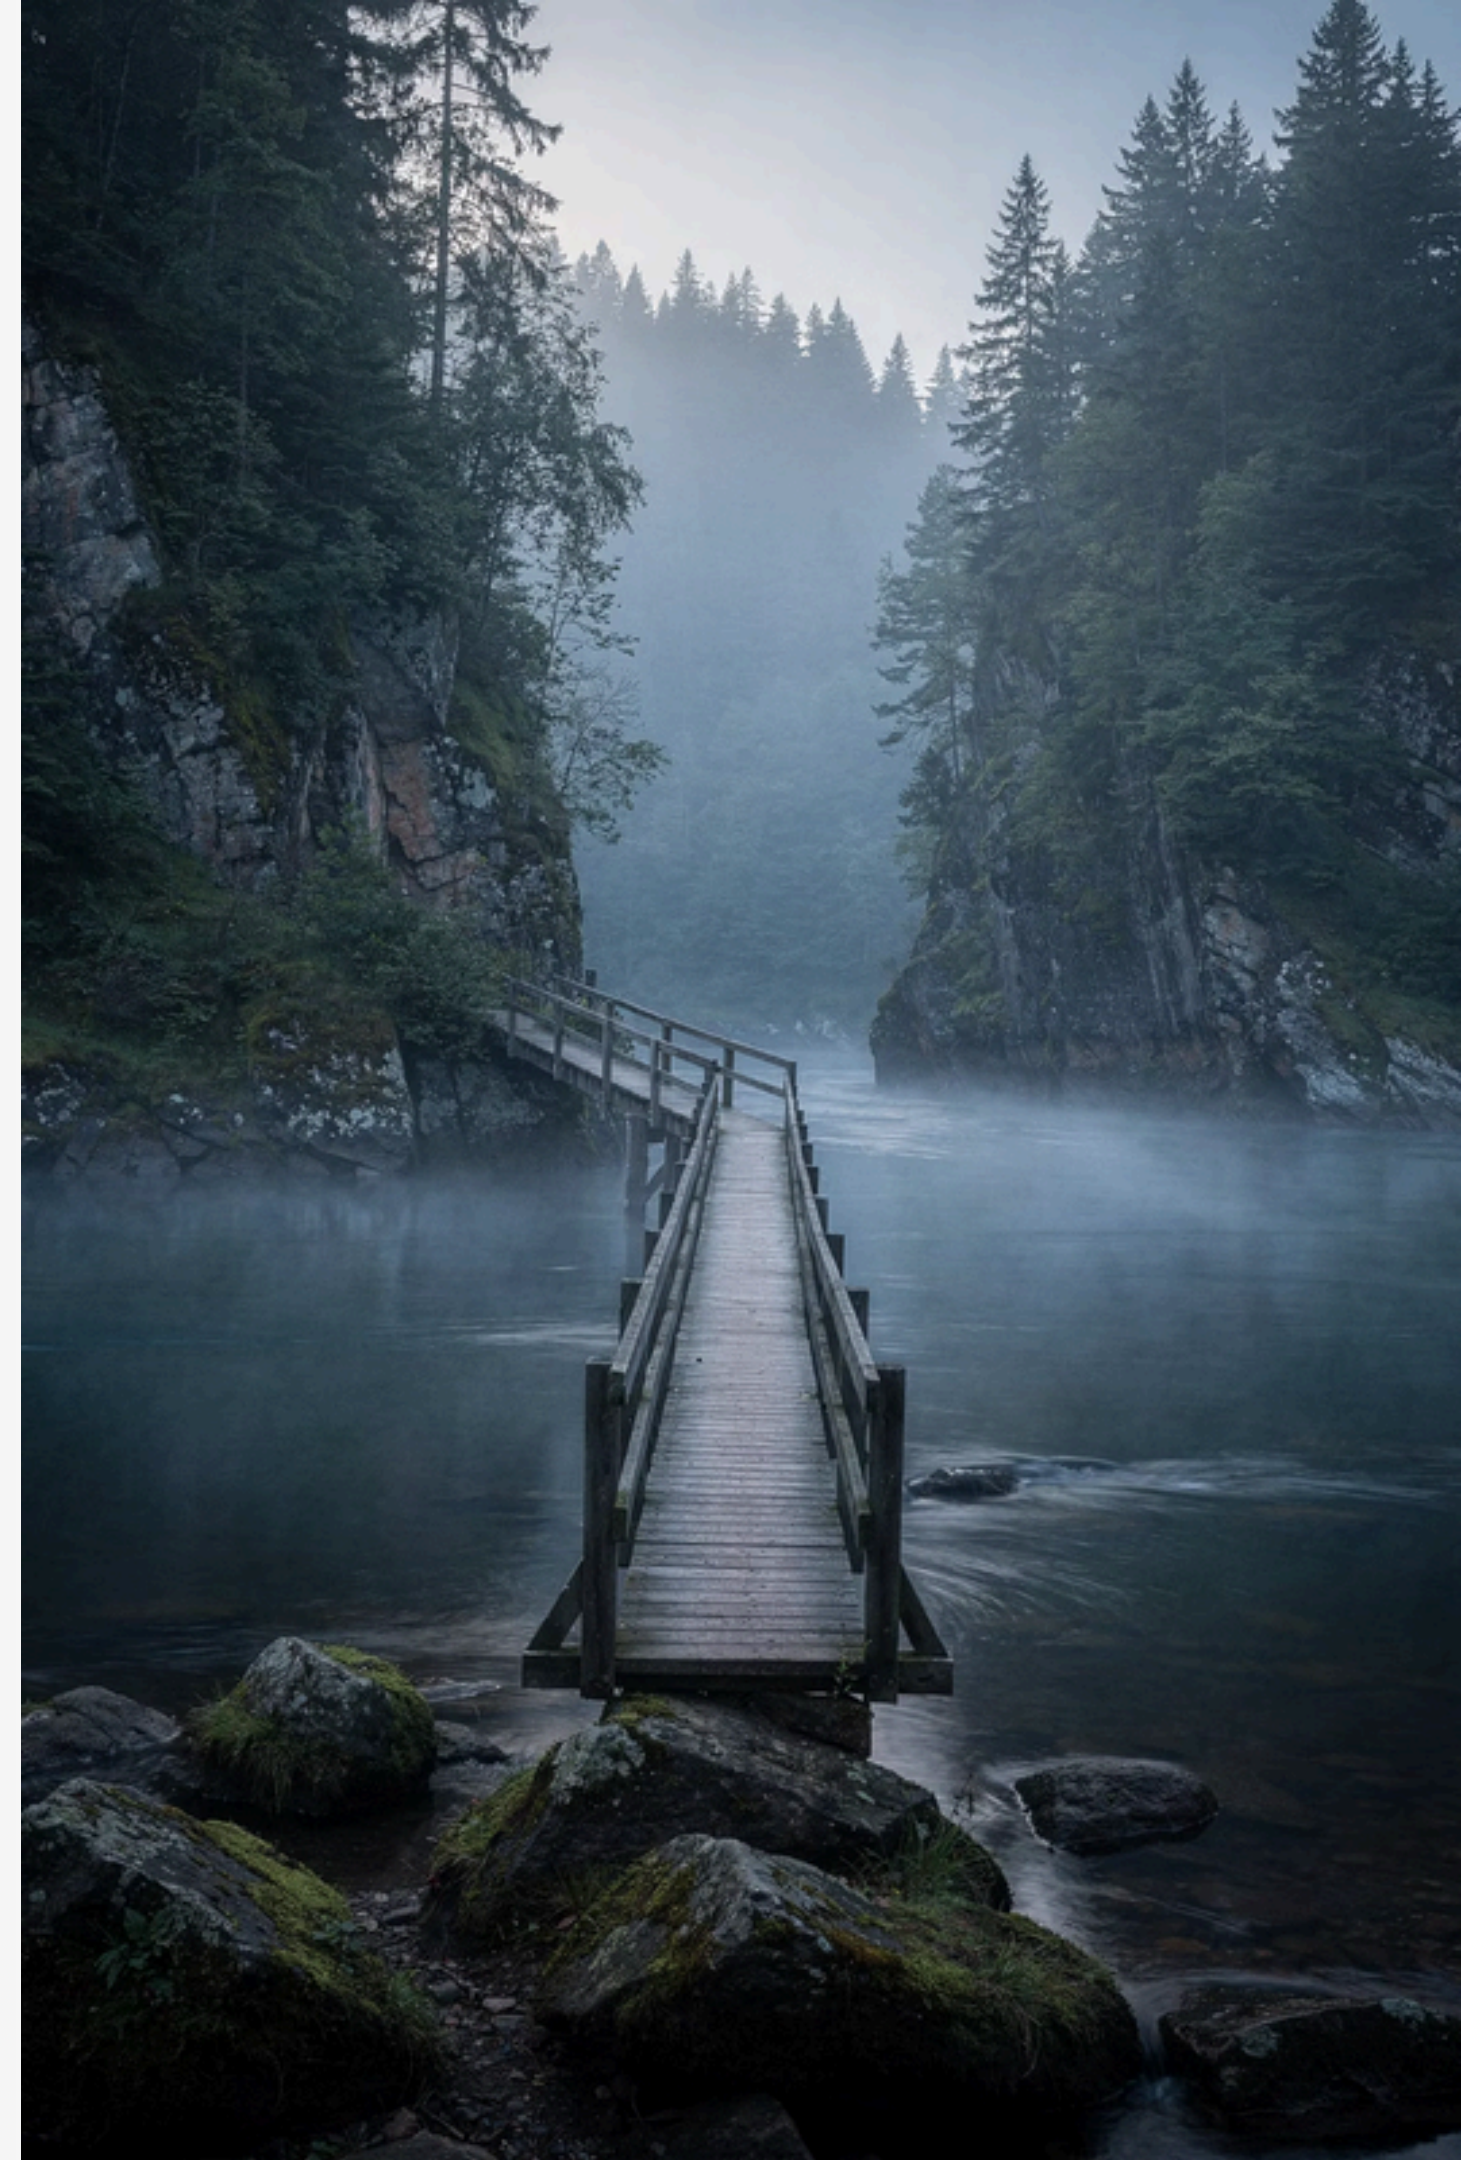

Fear of shame

Fear of not sounding like the expert I was

REFRAMING

My Niche Reframe

Your niche may be the bridge no
one else is building.

The Language Reframe

Your imperfect English may be the bridge..

someone else needs
to start speaking.

Started Submitting Sessions

Every submission felt like a small risk.

Every rejection felt personal.

Every acceptance felt suspicious.

Another uncomfortable thought appeared:

“What if they only accepted me
because I am a woman?”

Diversity gave me a chance.

It did not do the work for me.

Then came the feedback.

ECS 2024

A Co-Speaker Session

It did not feel like feedback.

It felt like proof.

Proof that I did not belong.

Proof that my English was not good enough.

Proof that maybe I should stop.

For a few hours, I wanted to disappear.

Then I decided:

One sentence does not get to decide whether I belong.

I didn't become louder.

I became braver with my quiet voice.

What is different today?

I speak beyond my niche.

I help new speakers begin.

I own my story.

And I know my voice matters.
